Sean T. Hamada is a principal and co-founder of Hamada Smith, PLLC and practices in the Firm's litigation section. Prior to forming Hamada Smith, Sean was a founding principal and the managing partner of Carter Scholer Arnett Hamada & Mockler, PLLC, a leading IP and commercial litigation boutique in Dallas, Texas.

Sean has more than 30 years of experience representing companies and individuals in Texas and California on a variety of business litigation and transactional matters. Early in his career, Sean developed the Los Angeles County Metropolitan Transportation Authority (MTA) as a client, and defended the MTA, its project managers, general contractors, and subcontractors on numerous multi-party litigation matters involving the construction of its light rail transit system, which at the time, was one of the largest federally funded public works projects in the country. Sean later combined his business background with his passion for technology by serving as a general counsel and executive for various related flat panel display (FPD) ventures that designed and produced displays and electronic modules for the telecommunications and emerging technologies industries.

Sean currently practices in both state and federal courts in Texas and California, and represents clients on complex, high stakes, business litigation matters, injunctions, arbitrations, and trials involving misappropriation of trade secrets, violations of the Texas Harmful Access by Computer Act, violations of the federal Computer Fraud and Abuse Act, breach of fiduciary duty, fraud, breach of contract, tortious interference, and shareholder derivative claims. Given his business and technology background, Sean is also frequently called upon to represent technology start-ups and entrepreneurs on entity formation, protection of intellectual property, contract negotiations, and outside general counsel matters.
